It is suggested that the pollution that produces acid rain, known to travel hundreds of kilometers from its source, may continue its travels into the pristine Arctic. It is noted that in contrast to the Arctic where air masses follow short, direct paths from pollution sources into low-lying arctic areas, the sources of pollution for the Antarctic, which is one of the cleanest places on earth, are farther away and the winds between them and the 3000-m-high interior follow long, rising spirals.

A model has been used to determine the average surface albedo of the earth's surface in latitudinal bands for the four seasons of the year. In addition, global maps of surface albedo for elements 10 deg latitude by 10 deg longitude are provided. The model involves assigning one of 49 different types of surface to each of 77,040 areas for each of the four seasons. Each type of surface is assigned a different albedo for each season. The average surface albedo for a given latitudinal band is obtained by averaging the albedos for the areas in the desired latitudinal band. The average surface albedos are intended to be used for input data in our radiative-convective energy balance model of the earth's atmosphere in order to compute the atmospheric temperature profile. The average annual albedo values for 18 different latitudinal bands are compared with the predictions of three other studies. The values in this work tend to be slightly lower than the others from 30N-30S, and slightly higher from 90-50N and 50-90S. The annual global average albedo is calculated to be 15.40 as compared to 13.0 for the previous predictions. The arctic and antarctic regions are discussed.

This report discusses the application of several modern geophysical techniques to groundwater exploration in areas of permafrost. These methods utilize the principles of magnetic induction and radiowave surface impedance in the 10- to 400 kHz band, the techniques of impulse and side-looking radar in the 50- to 10,000 MHz band, and also some optical techniques using imagery obtained from a satellite, all for detecting free water under an ice cover in shallow, almost completely frozen lake basins, and thaw zones within lake beds, stream channels, and in permafrost in general. The radar studies demonstrate the use of these techniques for determining depth of free water and ice cover thickness on lakes and rivers.

This report contains a detailed review of the theory and design of photoelastic transducers for measuring loads, strains, stresses and pressures. The measurement of engineering parameters under the adverse conditions normally encountered in the mining and civil engineering industries presents great problems, particularly where such measurements are to be made over long periods of time. Photoelastic transducers have distinct advantages over competing equipment in this respect in that the parameters to be measured are revealed as light interference fringes, and the measuring gage itself often need consist of nothing more than simple steel and glass components. Examples of such gages are given in the report. The majority of the work reported here was carried out by the staff and students of the Postgraduate School of Mining, Sheffield University.

NaNO<sub>2</sub>-Na<sub>2</sub>SO<sub>4</sub> combined additive in cold concrete. People's Republic of China. Concrete admixtures, Antifreezes, Concrete strength, Corrosion prevention, Winter concreting.

Experiments were conducted in which NaNO<sub>2</sub>, Na<sub>2</sub>SO<sub>4</sub> and N(C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>4</sub>OH)<sub>3</sub> were added to cold concrete to prevent freezing and promote strengthening. NaNO<sub>2</sub> was added in an amount equal to 13.3% of the water content of the concrete, and Na<sub>2</sub>SO<sub>4</sub> and N(C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>4</sub>OH)<sub>3</sub> in amounts equal to 3% and 0.03%, respectively, of the cement content. The concrete was kept from freezing at -10°C and the strength increased to over 60% of the design strength after 28 days and 80%-90% of the design strength after three months. This type of additive used at higher temperatures (+10 to +15°C) results in an early strengthening effect, good concrete density, resistance to infiltration of up to 28-30 kg/sq cm, strength in the later stages 5 to 10% greater than that of ordinary concrete, and physical properties superior to those of ordinary concrete. Because of the rust-preventing action of NaNO<sub>2</sub>, the cold concrete additives do not have any rusting or corroding effects on the steel bars. The facts that cold concrete is convenient to work with, additives are obtained easily and costs are comparatively low make this an excellent method for winter construction.

A method is described by which frost action (soil heaving and needle ice) and the use of soil additives for its control can be studied. The apparatus and procedure are simple and convenient, requiring no extensive space or services and using only small quantities of materials. The procedure could be useful in developing a standard test for such purposes where small scale and convenience are requisite. Also described are two simple, small-scale accessory tests that likewise relate to permeability of soils. These evaporation and wetting tests might also have similar use, particularly in the study of water migration-inhibiting additives.

Two sensors that depend on changes in soil resistivity were tested. Tests were conducted under a parking area with an asphalt-concrete surface where salt was periodically applied as part of snow removal operations. For comparison, data were obtained from a resistivity probe, a thermocouple probe and a thermistor probe. Results indicated that measuring temperature to determine frost penetration can lead to large errors under some conditions, for instance when salt has been applied or when frost is coming out of the ground in spring. The resistivity probe performed reliably during the entire measurement program. It was concluded that resistivity probes have definite advantages which should be considered when future frost penetration measurement programs are designed.

Sediments beneath the Beaufort Sea near Prudhoe Bay, Alaska, were probed at 27 sites using a static cone penetrometer to determine engineering properties and distribution of material types, including ice-bonded sediments. The probe provided both point and casing resistance data and thermal profiles. At five sites these data were correlated with information from adjacent drilled and sampled holes. These control data and the quality of the probe information permitted profiles of sediment type and occurrence of ice-bonded material to be developed along three lines that included various geological features and depositional environments. Material properties were quite variable in the upper 14 m of sediments probed. In general, softer, finer-grained sediments occurred in the upper layers, while penetration refusal was met in stiff gravels 10 to 12 m below the seabed. Seabed temperatures during the study were all below 0C. However, because of uncertainties in freezing point values caused by brines, evaluation of the penetration resistance data was required to identify the occurrence of ice-bonded sediments. The coupling of thermal and penetration resistance data revealed that seasonally ice-bonded sediments occurred where the sea ice froze back to or near the seabed. Deeper, perennially frozen sediments also appeared to be present at several probe sites. The penetration data obtained can be used to aid in the design of shallow and deep foundations in both ice-bonded and unfrozen subsea sediments.

Glacial deposits, Glacial geology, Sediment transport, Glacial till.

Sedimentation at the terminus of the Matanuska Glacier has been found to be primarily subaerial in a 100- to 300-m wide, ice-cored zone paralleling the edge of the active ice. Certain physical and chemical characteristics of the ice and debris of the superglacial, englacial and basal zones of the glacier indicate the debris of the basal zone, the primary source of sediment, is entrained during freeze-on of meltwater to the glacier sole. Till formation results from the melting of buried ice of the basal zone. Melt-out till inherits the texture and particle orientations of basal ice debris; other properties are not as well preserved. Most deposits result from sedimentation of till and debris by sediment gravity flows, meltwater sheet and till flow, slump, spall, and ice ablation. Depositional processes are interrelated in the process of backwasting of ice-cored slopes. Sediment flows are the primary process of sedimentation. Their physical characteristics, multiple mechanisms of flow and deposition, and characteristics of their deposits vary with the water content of the flow mass. Deposits of each process are distinguished from one another by detailed analysis of their internal organization, geometry and dimensions, and the presence of other internal and related external features. Genetic facies are defined by these characteristics.

Subsea cryolithozone of the Arctic Ocean.

Are, F.E., U.S. Army Cold Regions Research and Engineering Laboratory, May 1978, TL 686, 26p., ADA-069 856, For Russian original see 32-322. Refs. p.16-26.

Frozen rocks, Subsurface investigations, Shores, Sea level, Submarine permafrost.

The cryolithic zone is the designation for a zone of the Earth's crust having a sub-freezing point temperature, the frozen rocks are rocks which contain ice, the cold (frost) rocks are rocks whose temperature is below zero but do not contain ice.

It is reliably known that a cryolithic zone is extensively developed below the bottom of the Arctic Ocean and its fringe seas. However, the geocryological study of the sea bottom is extremely deficient. Reports about the distribution, properties and developmental principles of rocks of the sea bottom cryolithic zone have already long been necessary to support navigation through the northern maritime routes and for the construction of ports. Their requirement has sharply increased in connection with the initiated recovery of natural resources of the arctic shelf. The enormous practical significance, poorly studied nature of and poor access to the subsea cryolithic zone render its investigation one of the most interesting and pressing problems of modern cold research.

The six volumes present analyses and details of computer programs (Vol.2) which predict the feasibility of Great Lakes winter navigation under a variety of ice conditions and ship hull reinforcement configurations (Vols. 4 and 5) and power plant upgradings (Vol.3). The economic ramifications (Vol.3) of these variations form a major consideration of the programs. Since delays en route or in port represent a critical factor in Great Lakes shipping, a number of these are included in the programs to determine specific economic impacts.

Glacier ablation, Glacier flow, Antarctica—Rennick Glacier.
Unlike glaciers farther south along the Transantarctic Mountains, Rennick Glacier does not drain into the Ross Ice Shelf but flows directly into a seasonally ice-covered ocean. The primary controls on the activity of this glacier and others in this region are mass balance and sea-level. Two major glacial events are recorded in the upper Rennick Glacier region. The location of erratics and glacially scoured features suggest that during its oldest or Evans glaciation ice covered all but the highest peaks in the region. Following this glaciation a readvance produced the Rennick glaciation. Drift produced during this glaciation has a surface cover of unweathered clasts and is commonly found in the form of recessional moraines with associated ice-marginal lakes. Rennick Glacier is currently in a recessional phase of the Rennick Glaciation. The phase is characterized by physical re-adjustment of local ice masses including progressive inland migration of the Rennick Glacier grounding line. To date the grounding line has migrated up the mid-point of the glacier. This trend may be expected to continue. (Auth.)

The author presents a problem in which ice core drills, during the drilling process, come substantially off plumb and are horizontally well displaced from the point of entry by the time they reach their lowest drill level. He suggests a mechanism which causes the deviations and presents calculations for predicting, and thus, avoiding them. The calculations agree well in form but grossly disagree in magnitude. The author seeks help in solving this dilemma.

- 33-4563
This report, by the SCAR Working Group on Meteorology, assesses the role of Antarctica in long-term studies of the global climate system, the topic of a joint meeting of meteorologists, glaciologists, oceanographers, and upper atmosphere physicists during XV SCAR (1978). The discussions include examination of the basis for a SCAR program in support of global climatic studies, general comments, recommendations concerning antarctic research, and consideration of the relevance of antarctic glaciology, physical oceanography, and upper atmosphere studies to a SCAR program on climate. The glaciological studies fall into three groups, which are each considered in turn: snow and sea ice, the surface layer of the ice sheet down to a depth of 200 m, and the older ice inside of the ice sheet. A primary concern of the oceanographic investigations is the need to know how and why the ocean surface temperature varies. The use of satellite techniques as well as long-term measurements is stressed for oceanographic studies. The special geographic advantages which Antarctica offers for identifying and studying meteorological phenomena are discussed.

Potential of tree rings for reconstruction of past climate variations in the Southern Hemisphere. LaMarche, V.C., Jr., World Meteorological Organization. Publication, 1975, WMO No.421, WMO/IA-MAP Symposium on Long-Term Climatic Fluctuations, Norwich, Aug. 18-23, 1975, Proceedings, p.21-30, 20 refs. Ice cores, Climatic changes, Paleoclimatology.
- 33-4567
The importance of tree-ring data from the Southern Hemisphere as a source of paleoclimatic information is assessed. Tree-ring properties of potential worth for paleoclimatic inference include variations in ring width, density, and isotopic composition. It is probable that paleo-climatic information analogous to that found by isotopic analysis of ice cores from Greenland and Antarctica can be obtained from hydrogen isotope determinations of dated wood samples from trees. South America, with its temperate forests extending from Tierra del Fuego to central Chile, offers the greatest immediate potential for application of tree-ring data to paleoclimatic problems in the Southern Hemisphere. Previous studies citing evidence for the correlation of precipitation in Santiago, Chile with snow accumulation at Byrd Station, and the role of the circum-Antarctic ice pack in regulating the position of the circumpolar vortex are noted.

Ice cores, Volcanic ash, Paleoclimatology, Snow cover. Radiative transfer calculations of the global energy balance have been carried out to estimate the change in mean surface temperature that results from the addition of volcanic aerosols to the stratosphere. The results are consistent with the stratospheric warming observed in the first several months following the eruption of Mt. Agung and the average surface temperature decrease found for the two year period following major volcanic explosions. Changes in the level of volcanic activity appear to be an important factor for the temperature changes that have occurred over the last hundred years and may have contributed to some parts of the last major ice age. Some assessment of the importance of volcanic activity in causing or enhancing the ice ages has been obtained from studies of Greenland and antarctic ice cores.

The findings of a field study designed to generate fundamental data on multi-year pressure ridges in the near shore zone of the Canadian Beaufort Sea are presented. The study investigated the geometry of eleven floating multi-year ridges or ridge fragments and the sail height and keel depth of four additional multi-year ridge fragments. The cross-sections of multi-year ridges with total thicknesses varying between 9.6 and 41.8 m were examined, and the results suggest that they can be adequately represented by one ridge model with a constant sail to keel ratio and geometry. It is also shown that the ice comprising multi-year ridges is solid with the interblock voids existing at the time of their formation being completely filled with ice. The data obtained from this study are being used in the engineering design of exploration and production systems for the Beaufort Sea. In the shallow waters of this area, exploratory drilling from artificial islands has been carried out since 1973, and since 1976, the exploration effort has extended into the deeper waters of the Beaufort Sea, using drillships.

Ice pile-up and ride-up on Arctic and subarctic beaches.

Sea ice, Shores, Pressure ridges, Ice push.

Information on shore ice pile-up and ride-up in arctic and subarctic waters is presented. Cross-sectional profiles of several ice pile-ups and ride-ups are presented from which models and theoretical analyses were made. The expressions derived give the force required to overcome gravitational potential and friction occurring during ice-piling and ride-up. It was estimated that the distributed force required during ice-piling or ride-up was of the order of 10 to 350 kPa (about 1.5 to 50 psi). Field observations revealed that shore ice pile-up or ride-up appears to occur within a period of less than 30 minutes at any time of year, but most often in the spring and fall. Pile-up seldom occurs more than 10 m inland from the sea, but ride-up frequently extends 50 m or more inland, regardless of ice thickness. While steeply sloping shores do not favor ice ride-up, sea ice has mounted the steep, 9-m-high bluff at Barrow, Alaska, destroying structures and taking lives.

Ice strength, Compressive strength, Tensile strength.

The effect of temperature on the uniaxial strength of fine-grained, polycrystalline ice was investigated. Dumbbell-shaped specimens were loaded in uniaxial compression and uniaxial tension. Two machine speeds, 0.847 mm/s and 84.7 mm/s, were used for the tests, and the test temperatures ranged from -0.1 to -54°C. The uniaxial compressive strength is very sensitive to temperature, generally increasing as the temperature decreased from -0.1°C to -54°C, with the greatest increase between -0.1°C and -3°C. The tensile strength is not very sensitive to temperature, but did continue to increase with decreasing temperature. Tensile strength also increased the most between -0.1°C and -3°C. An initial tangent modulus and a 50% stress modulus were found for each compression test. The initial tangent modulus increased about two times as the temperature decreased from -0.1°C to -54°C. The 50% stress modulus also increased with decreasing temperature. A secant modulus was found for the tensile tests and it tended to decrease with decreasing temperature. The specific energy required to cause failure was also found for the compression and tension tests.

For bottom-founded structure simulation, a test pile was designed so that its stiffness, natural frequencies and modes and damping could be varied. The ice movement against the pile was arranged to have constant acceleration in order to excite different modes with different ice velocities. The flexibility of the drive system caused jerking ice movement with low velocities. Analysis of the recorded ice forces and acceleration includes the refinement at measured ice forces by eliminating the response of the measuring system itself, using dynamic equilibrium or transfer function approach. The frequency contents and the damping of vibrations are analyzed using Fourier signal analyzer. Results thus far show simultaneity with in-field ice force histograms: both random and saw-tooth like repetitive ice force fluctuations appear. The change from one interaction mode to the other with increasing drive velocities occurs. With high velocities relatively smooth random ice crushing occurs, and in some cases natural modes are stable. The greatest energy content of ice force does not always appear with the natural frequencies of structures.

Sea ice, Algae, Cryobiology, Weddell Sea. Physical and biological measurements were made of sea ice cores taken from 69 to 78 S in the Weddell Sea. Fluorescence measurements indicated an algal community that was strongly associated with salinity maxima within the ice. Maximum concentrations of chlorophyll a ranged from 0.31 to 4.54 mg cu m. Comparisons with standing crops in the water column indicate that the standing crop within the ice can represent a minor but significant fraction of the total standing crop for the region. The sea ice algal community is apparently distinct from others that have been described for land-fast ice in McMurdo Sound, sea ice in the Arctic, and pack ice off East Antarctica. The highest concentrations of biological material are found in the bottom or top samples from those regions, whereas the Weddell Sea maxima are concentrated at intermediate depths (0.65 to 2.15m) within the ice. A qualitative model indicating the relationship between thermally induced brine migration and subsequent algal growth is presented. (Auth. mod.)

This volume of 17 papers and abstracts, together with the first volume of the proceedings (F-20448 or 32-4707) presents various aspects of iceberg technology and its potential applications. The aim of the work included in this volume is to gain more understanding of tabular icebergs, their sources, properties and behavior, and to exchange views on plausible efficient ways of employing icebergs as a water resource. Other uses for icebergs which might be contemplated are for power generation, weather modification, mitigation of thermal effects, provision of suitable environment for mariculture, and recreation purposes (floating islands).

Water supply and weather modifications from transferred iceberg from Antarctica to countries of the world's "thirst belt". The use of antarctic icebergs as a source of fresh water and as a microclimate modifier is proposed. The production of fresh water from icebergs is believed to have only beneficial aspects. Only tabular icebergs are suitable for transport. The annual production of such icebergs is probably more than 10,000 (which melt away). Towing of such masses (100 million m<sup>3</sup> as a first step) is possible with existing tugs. Protection against excessive melting during transfer (6 to 8 months) is given, theoretically, by a "shell" maintaining a pool of cold water under and around the "foot" of the iceberg. Economically, the cost of iceberg produced water is competitive with the cost of water delivered by desalination. Study of the proposed operation and all of its phases leads to the conclusion that it is technically feasible and economically sound. (Auth. mod.)

This paper discusses the following aspects of iceberg towing: existing towboats and practical experience applicable to iceberg projects, necessary equipment for the transfer, sea and weather conditions, technical considerations, and human problems and safety. It is speculated that an iceberg, towed from the Weddell Sea vicinity to the Gulf of Aden, a voyage of roughly 9000 naut. mi, say, at the speed of one knot, would take approximately one year. Important considerations for such a venture include refueling at sea, tug maintenance, support vessels, equipment to be placed on the berg, etc. These matters are discussed.

The measurement of iceberg underwater dimensions and features will be essential for safe and effective choice, preparation, and transportation of icebergs. An iceberg's subsurface shape affects its deterioration, its form drag, and its strength. Short-pulse radar echo-sounding methods can be used to sound icebergs since polar fresh-water ice is highly transparent to radio signals. Available radar equipment can be used either from an aircraft or from the iceberg surface, and can provide reliable, easily-interpreted, real-time results. These systems can measure iceberg thickness and can provide information about inhomogeneities, such as crevasses, but further work is required to be able to estimate subsurface shape. This paper reviews the available literature on radio echo sounding of icebergs, including antarctic icebergs.

This paper describes the hypothetical transport of an antarctic iceberg to Saudi Arabia to illustrate the problems inherent in any tow across tropical waters. The towing route is from the Weddell Sea through the Pacific Ocean and the Arabian Sea to the Gulf of Aden. The following aspects of iceberg utilization are discussed: locating and harnessing, melting, transit, a course and timetable for the tow, and technological problems involved in utilizing water from the iceberg. The approximate cost for the delivery of water from an iceberg of the size chosen for this treatment to Saudi Arabia would be 53.7 cents per cu m, as compared with 80 cents per cu m for fresh water from desalination. Intensive field study is needed on the effects of currents and waves on motion and breakup, and the cost and feasibility of insulating. A trial tow would also be desirable.

Iceberg utilization and alternative systems related to fresh water transport—recycling and supplementary desalination.

Looyen, C.D., Desalination, Apr.-May 1979, 29(1/2), International Conference on Iceberg Utilization for Fresh Water Production, Weather Modification, and Other Applications, 1st, Iowa State University, Ames, October 2-6, 1977. Proceedings, Vol.2, p.173-189.
Water supply, Water treatment, Ice (water storage), Economic development, Transportation, Iceberg towing.

The author examines the subject of polar iceberg utilization and considers various plans for treating and transporting iceberg waters to Saudi Arabia. It is suggested that an iceberg ready for transport could be wrapped in a plastic diaper-like bag which would hold the melting fresh water, allowing it to subsequently be pumped away to shore reservoirs. Techniques of water recycling and desalination using solar power are examined and illustrated. The modes of transport considered include a submerged sea train and tankers. A system based on the conversion of in-use and new tankers for loading water and/or oil is described. It is further suggested that possible alternate solutions to Saudi Arabia's water problems may be found in close-by regions, i.e., the Nile River and under Egypt's desert.

Coillet, D.W., Desalination, Apr.-May 1979, 29(1/2), International Conference on Iceberg Utilization for Fresh Water Production, Weather Modification, and Other Applications, 1st, Iowa State University, Ames, October 2-6, 1977. Proceedings, Vol.2, p.191-196. Icebergs, Water supply, Ice (water storage), Cost analysis.

A study is made of the possible impact on the Arabian Peninsula of implementing, to a scale growing over 20 years to 3,000 million metric tons annually, the transportation to coastal ports of antarctic icebergs and the reticulation of water harvested from this source. Issues discussed include data collection, preparation of the load, and its navigation at sea and in confined channels. One version of staging, embayment, and harvesting was adopted for the study. The operation of onshore impoundment and pipelines was analyzed in detail, especially with respect to conjunctive seasonal supplies from all sources, and their use patterns. (Auth. mod.)

During limnological study in 1971-1976, numerous aspects of Lake Bonney's chemical, physical, and biological features from November through January were studied. The project goals consisted of characterizing the Lake's chemical, physical and biological features and the development of a mathematical model of the Lake ecosystem. The present work is the mathematical model, which consists of 21 simultaneous differential equations, 21 parametric equations, and 180 coefficients. A computer program has been written which numerically approximates the solutions to the differential equations, the results appearing as graphs or in tabular form. In addition, graphs of many of the parametric equations are available. The model may be adapted to similar lakes by changing the appropriate coefficients and parametric equations.

Tessensohn, F., Umschau, Apr. 15, 1979, 79(8), p.248-253, In German with English summary. 6 refs. Natural resources, Minerals, Exploration, Engineering geology.

Many articles appearing in the press during the last months gave the impression of Antarctica being the last source on earth for all kinds of natural resources, the "last treasury of mankind". These statements are critically tested in this article by summing up the facts on the so far known occurrences of mineral resources in Antarctica and the difficulties which a possible commercial exploitation of a mineral deposit would encounter. It is concluded, that mineral exploitation in Antarctica is unlikely in the near future, but research carried out now might well pay off for coming generations. (Auth.)

Snow composition, Snow impurities, Radioactive isotopes, Fallout.

Data are presented on the deposition of plutonium isotopes from the atmosphere at Dome C on the high antarctic plateau. The activities of Pu-239+240 and Pu-238 versus snow depth are plotted and discussed. The period of peak fallout of Pu-239+240 occurred during 1955-59 and appears to be representative of weapons tests at Bikini and Eniwetok. The Apr. 1964 burnup of a satellite (SNAP-9A) containing 17 kCi of Pu-238 in the southern stratosphere is recorded as a rapid activity in the 1965-66 stratum in the snow record of Pu-238 at Dome C. The profiles suggest that almost all of the plutonium isotopes injected into the atmosphere have now been removed. The activities of both Pu-239+240 and Pu-238 deposited during 1976 at Dome C were only 1.4% of the activities deposited during the respective periods of maximum fallout.

Ice cores and climatic change.

Ice sheets, Ice cores, Climatic changes, Ice dating, Glacial geology, Paleoclimatology, Antarctica—Byrd Station, Antarctica—Vostok Station.

The paper deals primarily with the use of stable isotopic ratios to determine the former climate of ice sheets. Studies of temperature profiles throughout ice sheets have shown that for at least several thousand years, changes of isotopic delta ratios have been proportional to changes of surface temperatures; this relationship is discussed in terms of the physical processes involved. It is considered reasonable to use a similar relation for earlier periods in Antarctica, but in Greenland the relation may have varied with time. When determining past climates from the isotopic record, allowance must be made for changes in the flow and thickness of ice sheets during major glacial periods. These factors are considered in relation to major ice cores from Vostok and Byrd stations in Antarctica and from Camp Century in Greenland. Vostok is the simplest case glaciologically, Camp Century the most complex. On purely glaciological grounds it appears that the ice age gave way to present-day climates some 10000 B.P., the coldest period being 20000 B.P., when the climate in Antarctica was 6-8°C colder than at present. Glaciological data suggest a duration of 50,000 to 100,000 years for the last ice age. Before this period, climates in Greenland and Antarctica appear to have been around 2-3°C warmer than at present. (Auth)

This article describes methods of towing icebergs devised at Memorial University in Newfoundland and tested in the North Atlantic. The original impetus for the project came from the need to protect offshore oil platforms from iceberg flows but such technology would be applicable for towing icebergs to arid regions for use as drinking water, "floating freezers," and weather control devices.

NOTE

This is a companion issue to CRREL Report 12, Vol. 33, Pt.1. The latter contains the full bibliographic citations referred to in the author and subject indexes included in this issue. In the author index principal and joint personal and corporate authors are listed along with the title, date, pagination, and language of the document and the accession number. The subject index is composed of three basic elements: 1) terms taken from a controlled vocabulary based on the Thesaurus of Engineering and Scientific Terms (LEX-EJC), 2) free terms added as needed, 3) geographic names, generally entered under countries. The terms are listed in a single alphabetical arrangement, along with title (original, translated, abridged, expanded, or supplied), principal author, date, pagination, and language of pertinent documents, and their accession numbers.

When ordering this publication, both Parts 1 and 2 should be ordered, as they are complementary.
